Medical Malpractice Happens

Wednesday, June 17th, 2009 at 10:39 pm

Medical hit-and-runs happen when patients are gravely injured or killed by medical error. These are errors that can be prevented but sometimes, nurses and doctors pretend like nothing happened. This occurs almost every day across America. However, most patients cannot tell the difference between "normal stuff" and preventable harm.

And when families learn the truth either from accident or from hiring a lawyer, their confidence and trust in the medical system may vanish in an instant. The medical injury compounded by lying and betrayal carries a long-lasting and searing pain for these families.

The only way that these victims of medical malpractice can fight back is through their right to sue. Certainly, they can claim financial compensation to stave off the possible bankruptcy of a serious injury or death. These cases can leave the family with huge medical bills or unending debt.

Remember that the healing process for these medical injuries is filing a lawsuit. Some say that they don't really want revenge, just to save other people from experiencing the same thing.

It's possible that the medical industry today is beginning to neglect patient safety. More than a decade after entering the 21st century, the industry denies the legitimate role of patients in enforcing and monitoring their own safety. In fact, a complex structure of "privilege" and confidentiality laws are ensuring that safety reviews are never reported in any form accessible to the public.
